Societal Impact Statement:

My goal is to create an environment in the classroom that is conducive to bringing out the potential that each student possesses. I have been teaching the Principles of Financial Accounting course for the past eighteen years and have focused on establishing an atmosphere that emphasizes both the learning of accounting principles and the growth of the student. My basic philosophy is that an encouraging teacher breeds an enthusiastic student.

The class I teach is an entry level course, therefore it is typically the first exposure to a business class for most. I want my students to understand the course material, but of equal importance to me is for them to develop a capacity to organize their thoughts in attacking and solving a difficult problem. The lessons learned in my class are not restricted only to accounting concepts, but also skills which aid in organization, time management and the development of proper study habits.

It is my belief that if a student feels you care about them, you receive a more conscientious effort on their behalf to learn. I make a concerted effort to develop a personal relationship with as many of my students as possible. Many tell me how appreciative they are when I refer to them by name and show an interest in their lives. I try to convey to each of them that, even in a university as large as Texas A&M, there is someone who is interested in them and cares about their progress. I encourage them to visit with me in my office, after class or by e-mail when they have questions or concerns.

I am mindful that the reason I teach these young people is because they are at Texas A&M to receive an education, and that I am in the classroom for their benefit. I love my students! I love to witness them rising above their limitations and to see the "light bulb" moment when the big picture takes shape and the concepts all fit together. It is incredibly rewarding for me to see them overcome obstacles and take pride in their accomplishments.
